Gentrification and impoverishment in the metropolis

28 Mar. 2019
28 Mar. 2019

One of the main challenges faced by large cities and metropolitan areas is the contradiction between the key role they play in the world economy and global society, and the unequal distribution of the benefits brought by this role within each metropolitan area. One of the most visible aspects of this inequality is gentrification, a process that nearly all the metropolises in the world have experienced to some extent or other. In broad terms, gentrification consists of the expulsion of inhabitants from impoverished urban neighbourhoods after the areas are chosen for urban regeneration and property development projects, becoming inaccessible to the original population due to higher housing prices and the corresponding goods and services.

To talk about this process of gentrification, we will present Issue Paper 7 of the Metropolis Observatory "Gentrification and pauperisation of the metropolises", elaborated by Mr. Josep Maria Pascual, sociologist and expert in urban development.
